XXII. PERSONAL STATEMENT

Research

From an early age, I was attracted to technology and coding. While pursuing a PhD in clinical psychology, I gained firsthand knowledge of the challenges in mental health care delivery. Recognizing these issues, I envisioned technology as a means to enhance the care landscape. Concurrent with my clinical studies, I explored the field of quantitative psychology, completing much of the available graduate coursework and a substantial project that mirrored the depth of a second dissertation. After my doctorate, I undertook a fellowship at Harvard Medical School and Massachusetts General Hospital. Here, my focus was twofold: on digital interventions, which involve using technology such as apps to support mental health, and on digital phenotyping, the practice of analyzing data from personal devices to understand individual health patterns. My work during this period centered on developing software for data collection from smartphones, refining methods to extract meaningful health indicators (or "biomarkers") from this data, and weaving in my psychological knowledge to shape our analytical models. This blend of expertise positioned me to lead a lab in computational psychiatry, a field at the nexus of mental health, data analysis, and technology.

Despite the widespread prevalence of mental health issues, most individuals with diagnosable conditions do not receive care due to factors like stigma, limited providers, high costs, and inconvenience. Digital treatments address these challenges by providing evidence-based interventions at scale, ensuring privacy, convenience, and affordability. Continuous data collection through smartphone and wearable sensors provides insight into real-time mental health fluctuations. This allows for interventions during periods of heightened risk, such as during instances of suicidal ideation, when traditional care models may not effectively respond in-time. The field is poised for a shift towards technology-driven, personalized, and predictive mental healthcare. My research focuses on the development and evaluation of these methods, aiming to enhance support for those with mental health challenges.

My research centers on the use of intensive longitudinal data and digital interventions to study anxiety and depressive disorders. By developing smartphone applications, I have collected passive mobile sensing data from over 10,000 participants across more than 100 countries, including hourly assessments of anxiety and depressive symptoms in subjects with generalized anxiety and social anxiety disorders. A cornerstone of my research is personalized models, which are machine learning constructs tailored to an individual's time series data. These models analyze the relationship between symptoms, captured via ecological momentary assessments (e.g., intensive measurements of real-time self-reports of mental health symptoms repeatedly within the context of free-living conditions) and passive sensing data elements such as social interactions, application usage patterns, GPS locations, ambient light conditions, and movement patterns. Feedback from these models has shown reductions in anxiety and depressive symptoms, improved heart rate variability, increased social contact, and enhanced physical activity. However, creating personalized models presents challenges due to the nature of time series data and the intricacies of training algorithms on individual datasets. To address this, I have developed time series modeling techniques, including methods to determine when time series data optimally predict one another, and personally weighted deep learning models. These methods help in understanding the relationships between variables and allow for more accurate predictions and interventions. Utilizing this approach, my aim is to provide insights into mental health dynamics and inform more tailored interventions.

Over the past six years, my research program has produced 39 publications with a primary focus on using passively collected sensor data to achieve four objectives: (1) detect psychiatric disorders, (2) measure disorder severity, and predict both (3) long-term and (4) short-term changes in mental health. Specifically, my work centers on creating digital biomarkers of mood and anxiety disorders using machine learning models. Digital biomarkers refer to specific measurements and indicators derived from digital technology, such as smartphone sensors, wearable sensors, electronic health record data, internet search data, and social media data, used to detect disorders, measure severity, and predict changes in mental health. By employing smartphone sensors, wearable sensors, electronic health record data, internet search data, and/or social media data, my research has demonstrated that machine learning models can: (1) distinguish people with major depressive disorder, posttraumatic stress disorder, and generalized anxiety disorder from non-disordered controls; (2) detect symptom severity of major depressive disorder, active suicidal ideation, social anxiety symptom severity, pain severity, and worry severity; and (3) detect antidepressant medication use. Additionally, I have utilized passively collected data to predict changes in symptoms of major depressive disorder over two weeks of treatment; changes in suicidal ideation, intent, and completion over several months; and deterioration of anxiety disorders over a span of 17 to 18 years. Furthermore, my research has revealed that passive smartphone and wearable sensor data can predict hour-to-hour changes in major depressive disorder, anxiety disorders, eating disorders, and overall mental health in non-disordered employees. In our analyses, my lab found that personalized models yield optimal performance. However, these models require data from specific participants for training. A primary challenge our lab addresses is determining conditions under which generalizable models can cater to a broad population and pinpointing scenarios in which individual data is essential. This involves quantifying the precise data volume needed to refine these models and aiming to minimize patient burden while maximizing utility. Collectively, my work suggests that objective digital biomarkers can provide precise assessments of psychopathology. By creating cutting-edge digital biomarkers for mood and anxiety disorders through machine learning models, my work has pioneered a new era of precise, objective assessments of psychopathology, setting the stage for a future where mental health care is both more objective, accessible, and effective.

In the past decade in 27 publications, I've focused on developing and evaluating digital therapeutics that aim to personalize intervention delivery at scale. Digital therapeutics refers to the use of digital tools and technologies, such as smartphone apps, to deliver evidence-based therapeutic interventions for the treatment and prevention of diseases and disorders. In particular, my co-authors and I have developed seven digital therapeutics targeting: anxiety disorders, depressive disorders, eating disorders, and/or substance use disorders, predominantly administered using smartphone apps. In randomized controlled trials, we have found evidence of differential symptom reduction in depressive symptoms, anxiety symptoms, eating disorder severity and incidence, and substance use severity. To personalize digital therapeutic treatment delivery, I use machine learning models to predict individual treatment response. I have found that I was able to accurately predict individual participant changes in major depressive disorder symptom severity, anxiety disorder symptom severity, and stress from pre- to post-intervention. As a whole, my work suggests that digital therapeutics can effectively treat and prevent mental illness, and individual treatment response can be accurately predicted to better deliver personalized medicine at scale. Given the large unmet population-level mental health needs, these digital therapeutics show great promise in addressing the treatment gap and providing scalable, personalized care to those suffering from mental illness.

Teaching

As an educator and mentor, I have taught various courses and guided students at all academic levels. My teaching philosophy emphasizes curiosity, independent thinking, and lifelong passion for learning. To date, I have served as the sole instructor for five different courses (QBS 126, QBS 270, PSYCH 238; PSYCH 301W; PSYCH 481). In Fall 2021, my class size dropped from 10 to 1 due to scheduling conflicts; after rescheduling in the spring, enrollment rose to 22. I have also given six guest lectures. In my first year at Dartmouth, I elected to co-instruct a journal club course despite my appointment letter stating that I was not required to do so. My approach to teaching and learning is grounded in the belief that: “the value of an education ... is not the learning of many facts, but the training of the mind to think something that cannot be learned from textbooks.” (Albert Einstein). I seek to empower my students with the tools and knowledge they need to thrive both academically and professionally.

In addition to teaching, I have advised and mentored students and professionals across various fields, including two K award mentees, five postdoctoral students, four PhD students, six master's students, two medical residents, five research assistants/research coordinators, and well over 100 undergraduates. I have found immense joy in supporting and guiding students through the challenges of their academic and professional paths, helping them to realize their goals and develop the skills they need to succeed. My mentorship has helped students publish research, secure fellowships, and attain top employment positions. One particularly rewarding aspect of my work has been my involvement with Undergraduate Research Assistantships at Dartmouth (URAD) programs, which provide opportunities for undergraduate students to engage in cutting-edge research across a range of fields. As a mentor in these programs, I have supported 38 students in pursuing their research interests and developing their skills, providing them with guidance and feedback every step of the way. Seeing the enthusiasm and dedication of these students has been one of the highlights of my career, and I am constantly inspired by their curiosity and drive.

Service

I actively serve the academic community at Dartmouth, believing in the importance of community contribution. I've served on the PhD and MS admissions committees for the Quantitative Biomedical Science programs and as a site lead at the Center for Technology and Behavioral Health, where I interview and evaluate candidates for the Psychiatry Research Track Residency program. As a member of these committees, I have had the opportunity to work with a diverse group of applicants from around the world and to help select the next generation of scholars in the field. As a member of the Geisel Faculty Council, I act as a liaison between the faculty and the Dean's office, providing input and feedback on policies and procedures. Finally, I have served on three faculty search committees, chairing one, and helped to recruit top talent for four positions, from junior to senior levels.

Summary

Now in my sixth year at Geisel, I have published 131 peer-reviewed publications (the vast majority first or senior authored), 6 book chapters, and served as lead editor on a book. As a PI, I have secured over $10 million in funding, and as a co-I, I have secured over $40 million. I have been invited to present my work locally, nationally, and internationally. This work has been accomplished in mentored collaboration with over 100 trainees across all levels. Moreover, I play an active role in serving the Dartmouth community, participating in two graduate admissions committees, three faculty search committees, and serving on the faculty council. Beyond these metrics, the promise and impact of my work lie in revolutionizing mental health care through innovative, scalable, and personalized approaches that have the potential to transform lives and address the pressing global mental health crisis.
